He is thus compared with Forrest by Lawrence Barrett, (Barrett s Edwin Forrest, p. 98.) The one was supported and maintained by the genetations which had grown up with the veteran, had seen the various stages of his career passed triumphantly, and who sought no improvement; the other represented the hopeful expression of the new generation which forms its own ideas by the impressions of its times, and is not slavishly bound to the past. He is compared with Fechter, by Mr. G. B. Woods, in Old and New, April, 1870, v. 1, P-515--17. He says of Booth s Hamlet, that he has refined it and polished it until all the crudity is gone; but some of the real virile strength of the Hamlet of the young days has gone with it; while Mr. Fechter s readings, he declares,...
